Texture and tact. Design is capable of technical wonders which sometimes reflect more the final product (output) than the initial sketch.

At Studio Gameiro we are somehow contrary to this trend and focus on the initial elements, doubt and wonder, which come up from looking and touching the raw materials, and imagining how they will be transformed and transported into the realm of a home, its setting, its stage. The Dolmen Console, which is a creative departure from a few tailor-made pieces made for the Palmeira Apartment in Lisbon, is the perfect example of that almost puzzle-like ability to use stone (in this case Lecarrow Limestone) in a poetic way without losing its rough on the edges texture. The way we tried out several configurations of equilibrium (not only in terms of forms but also cuts), and how every “board” and leg was hand and bush hammered, showcases how we work at the Studio. Why be afraid of try-outs if what comes out of them is timeless?
